Europe's image

Is European society ready to accommodate large numbers of these knowledge immigrants? And what is more, are south Asians willing to make up for the shortage of labourers in Europe?

Highly skilled Indians, for example, do not always feel attracted to Europe and not only because of language barriers. We need to find out how Europe is experienced by them. A recent report from the European Commission shows that, at a time when international relations between Asia and Europe have significantly increased, the mutual awareness between both continents remains unchanged. Stereotypes on both sides still represent Europe as introspective and old-fashioned, and Asia as a remote and exotic continent that brings more challenges than opportunities.

Many there think of Europe not as a land of milk and honey, but rather as conservative and plagued by racism. In other words, Europe needs to confront a very negative image in Asia. Therefore, we need to think about how to find the key to changing this view. Asia has been learning from Europe for decades, but has Europe ever asked whether it can learn from another culture, such as India’s?

Esther Bloch
Ghent University

©OECD Observer No 266 March 2008

Related links
- OECD work on India
- All OECD Observer articles on India
- OECD European Community page

Related articles:

Economic instruments in the fight against climate change
Interview with Doris Leuthard
Climate change
A new Contract
Economics climate
Subprime crisis: A capital issue

NOTE: All signed articles in the OECD Observer express the opinions of the authors and do not necessarily represent the opinion of the OECD or its member countries.

All rights reserved. OECD 2008.